We approach feminist servers
as an emancipating space, where we develop and share our technical skills and care for our bodies, machines and tools along feminist pedagogies.

Instead of thinking in terms of a purely technical architecture, in this context a server becomes an affective infrastructure organizing the relations that form around it.

for us
– queer, non-binary, trans, women identified people – in a cis male heteronormative, patriarchal environment of Free and Open Source, Arts, Technology and Knowledge production

AFFECTIVE INFRASTRUCTURES

nate wessalowski:
affective infrastructure are always situated, they have a time and a place that we can see from our perspective so it's easier to avoid invisibilized labour [IT] relies on the care and work of our friends and allies

Speculative roles & responsibilities

“To coordinate among ourselves, we privilege the no pressure policy for advancing tasks that are freely chosen based on the energy, dreams and availability of AnarchaServer inhabitants.”

Guardians

people who are in charge of checking for possible bugs [...] to ensure their security and the functionality of the applications.

Fire extinguishers

people who have the most experience and to whom we can turn if we suffer an attack or something very strange is happening

ai carmela:

we can upgrade the old feminist slogan "personal is political" and say personal data is political. under contemporary cis-hetero-patriarchy, within the current matrix of domination, our affective labour that produces our personal and political data is exploited through vectors of information owned by cis men.

Si el mayor problema del ciberfeminismo en sus inicios era el acceso, el problema crítico del ciberfeminismo contemporáneo es el control.

the critical problem of contemporary cyberfeminism is control.

INTIMACY COORDINATOR
An intimacy coordinator (IC) is an expert in how to analyse a script in order to evaluate it's intimate scenes. They inform and advocate for the actors, facilitate conversation and choreograph intimate scenes to carry the director's vision while staying within the performer's boundaries
